ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This thesis, titled “Female Heroes in Chinese and Khasi Folktales: Exploring Gender Dynamics and Cultural Representations”, has been a journey of curiosity, support, and guidance. My daughter, Rijula, inspired this research when she asked a simple yet intriguing question, “Why does a tale always have to revolve around a son and not a daughter?” This question provided me with the spark and that is when the idea began evolving into this study.

I thank my supervisor, Professor Debarshi Prasad Nath, from the Department of Cultural Studies, for his unwavering support. His supervision was extremely important in moulding a vague idea into a structured research plan. His support is immeasurable and for that I sincerely appreciate his mentoring.

I extend my gratitude to all the faculty members in the Department of Cultural Studies for their valuable suggestions during this research endeavour. I also wish to thank my fellow research scholars whose contributions aided me to complete the dissertation. The insights given by them made this piece of work possible.

I wish to express my deepest appreciation to the head of the Department of Foreign Languages, as well as all my colleagues, for their understanding and continual collaboration with me. Their help in relieving me off some burdens enabled me to focus on writing my chapters free of anxiety.

Finally, my appreciation goes to the officials of the central library of our university for their remarkable cooperation in giving me access to a wide range of materials. They did everything possible for me to obtain the materials that were crucial to my work.

My heartfelt thanks go to my wife, Jayita, who motivated me hugely in this endeavour, bringing to life this concept as a research project. Her motivation to put in the necessary effort gave me the energy to see this work through. My son, Rishith, served immensely as well, as he sat beside me and made sure that I was both engaged and focussed to finish the work.

In conclusion, this thesis would not have been achievable without the undiluted efforts alongside motivation from my family, mentors, and colleagues as well as the wider academic community. I owe you all immense respect and gratitude for inspiring and supporting me.
